Objectives:

1. To develop interest about wildlife in our students and an outdoor biologist can provide valuable insights into various aspects of ecology, biodiversity, conservation and field research techniques
2. Their expertise can offer unique perspectives on wildlife behaviour, habitat conservation and the impacts on human activities on ecosystems.

Reports:

The introduction of the speaker by himself was intriguing. He could generate interest among the audience almost immediately. Being an outdoor biologist sounds like a dream, it is indeed so but Dr Roy highlighted the demands of being an outdoor biologist. His personal experiences on working with lion-tailed macaques, studying their distinct faces and social behaviour, in their natural habitat in the Nilgiris, observing their interaction within the troops was portrayed beautifully with photographs and illustrations. He spoke elaboratively on the field work on black bears in the areas around a water body in Arunachal Pradesh, setting camera traps and conducting habitat assessment to understand their ecology and behaviour. His talk inspired several students to participate in his endeavours and to become outdoor biologist themselves later in life.
